John Mitchell's Retirement.

While John Mitchell is very slowly recuperating from two severe operations at the hospital in La Salle, Ill., the United Mine Workers of America are reluctantly receiving nominations of other men to succeed their long-loved leader. His retirement, despite all the urgency of devoted following can bring against it, is wholly due to his loyalty to the miners, whom he assures that he is "no longer well enough to give your interests the consideration their importance demands."

The injury, which lays him aside at the early age of thirty-seven, is said to be due to a strain in lifting a car when at work in the mines. While the surgeons gave promise of ultimate but slow recovery, the close of his nearly ten years' leadership leaves him secure in the possession of the highest reputation attained by any American labor leader.

His was a difficult, delicate and dangerous leadership as could fall to the lot of any man in public office. When it was thrust upon him, there were only 43,000 miners organized in a few scattered local unions, but they spoke the language of no less than twenty-two nationalities, and were further divided into seventeen exclusive religious sects.

He now turns over the command to his successor a rank and file of 375,000 men, thoroughly organized as the United Mine Workers of America, and wonderfully well disciplined by the hard struggles through which he has led them to the triumphs of self-control and the winning of their rights.—Graham Taylor in December Charities and The Commons.
